Philharmonic Instrument Values

When you sit back in your orchestra chair and feel the impassioned rhythm of the conductor's baton and hear the inspiring music of the eighty men, as they had been one, little do you think the cost of the various factors that produce the soul-stirring strains. And yet the character of their instruments is an important part in the maintenance of an orchestra's reputation, and specially is this true when the orchestra is the New York Philharmonic, which is scheduled to play a grand Oklahoma City benefit at the Overholser on April 26.

The cost of acquiring the instruments for such an orchestra is enormous, and for each instrument, the Philharmonic has a list of makers.

Violin makers are represented: Stravarius, Guenerius, Amati, Maggini, Guadagnini all have their violins; those that are not set by a common standard.

Maximilian Filzer, the youthful is only because each player owns his instrument and takes a personal pride in owning the best of its kind that the standard can be maintained.

The tympani are perhaps the only instruments in the Philharmonic not owned by the individual players. A set of These were imported from Vienna just before the war broke out, and they cost about $100. This is the highest price ever paid for a set of these copper kettle drums, but they are of exceptional clarity of tone and carrying power, and re-equipped with a new machine for accurate and fast tuning.

All the other instruments in the orchestra are owned by the players. It is surprising to the layman to count the value represented. The cost of the conharmonic before he assumed major duties, played on a Strandinvarius and his successor, Alvin Wiegner, on beautifully preserved Hergonst.

No mediocre instruments are permitted in the Philharmonic organization.
